COUNTERFEITING MACHINES
CATCH GULLIBLE ONES

Swindlers Still Palming Off Devices to Make One Dollar Grow Another One

KANSAS CITY, July 4.—The name of science covers a multitude of sins—and is a cloak of protection for innumerable evil doers. As the Wrights, Hieriot, Edison and Marconi profit by legitimate inventions, so there are criminals continually studying out ingenious "fake" inventions with which to catch the gullible public.

The bait they use is always the same. From the vendor of the simple "gold brick" of a decade or more ago to the promoter of the most ingenious device of today, the criminal always plays on one weakness of human nature—the desire to get something for nothing. A search through the criminal records will show that the latest scheme of clever crooks to wheedle money from the unsophisticated is but an old one worked over.

One of the most recently exposed frauds, brought to public notice in Chicago only a few days ago, is a machine which it was claimed would duplicate paper money.

Made One Bill After Another. When brought to light, this machine was heralded as an entirely new device in the history of crime. In a sense, it is new, but in principle it is no different from a "ten-dollar gold piece" machine taken by the Kansas City police twelve years ago, and which now hangs in a glass cabinet at police headquarters.

The device recently brought to light consisted of an elaborate looking box on the outside of which was a small crank. The prospective victim was told, confidentially, that within the machine there operated a chemical process by which impressions from new paper currency could be transferred to a certain sort of sensitized paper. All that was necessary was to place the bills and the sensitized paper in alternate layers—insert them into the machine through a slot—and turn the crank. When they came out, the impression on the sensitized paper could not be distinguished from the bills themselves. It was explained that only a limited number of duplications could be made from a single bill, as the ink used in the engraving of the bill would last for only about ten impressions.

Could anything be more propitious? Probably not, unless it is the old ten-dollar gold piece mold which has been out of use so long that no one remembers who it was that invented it.

A Turn of the Crank—20 Bills. The victim who was caught by the "currency duplicator" was shown how he could multiply his money twenty times in as many minutes. Ten bills and ten pieces of paper were run into the machine. A swishing sound came from within—indicating that the mysterious chemical process was at work. To add to the effect, fumes came out through a funnel in the top. Another turn of the crank, and out came—twenty bills!

The victim hurried away to raise every cent he could in new, fresh currency, so that he might quickly take advantage of the kind inventor's offer to let him use this marvelous device. When he returned with all the bright, clean bills he could raise it was, of course, a simple trick for the crook to get the money into his own hands and make his escape.

The old "ten-dollar gold piece" machine down at police headquarters was sold under the claim that pouring a certain molten mixture into it—a mixture which contained no gold—coins closely resembling ten-dollar gold pieces would be formed.

The machine is composed of two hollow brass drum-shaped compartments, hinged so that when closed they fit tightly together, facing each other. In the center of the faces that close against each other is a depression, resembling a mold. A funnel, into which the molten metal was poured, apparently allowed it to run into this mold, but in reality deposited it within one of the drums. In the other drum a number of gold pieces were concealed. When the machine was closed and the metal had been poured in, a lever was manipulated which dropped a gold piece—a real one, not a counterfeit—into the mold. The machine was opened and there it lay, fresh and bright.

The owner of the machine picked it up with a pair of pliers, dropped it into a glass of water with enough acid to set up a hissing, as of suddenly cooling metal, and then drew it out.

The gold piece was given to the prospective victim, who was told to take it to the bank. Of course, the bank accepted it, and, filled with wild dreams of sudden wealth, the victim scurried together every cent he could to purchase this wonderful machine.

Probably now that the currency duplicator has been exposed, some gang of criminals, somewhere under lock and key, is at work figuring out some new device, which will be but the same story told again.

ARMY MAY GROW OWN FORAGE HERE

Hay Shipment Delayed and the Cavalry and Battery Nags Turned Out to Graze

Threatened with a serious shortage of forage for the mounted troops at Schofield Barracks, the quartermasters department has just received word that a large shipment of hay is on the way from Seattle, and will be here about the 20th of this month.

This relieves that situation which, while not alarming, was causing considerable inconvenience at the big brigade post, and which was keeping the troop and battery commanders on the anxious seat. Last Sunday the last pounds of hay were issued in some of the cavalry troops of the Fifth, and the horses turned out to crop the short grass in lieu of munching from their mangers. There is plenty of grain on hand, so the stock is really suffering no hardship. Yesterday the depot quartermaster sent out all the hay that he could spare from the town supply, and with the full supply to arrive within a week, the trouble will be tided over. May Grow Own Hay.

The present shortage, and the possibility of all forage being cut off in time of war, has called attention to an experiment which the War Department is planning to make on Oahu. It is believed by Major H. Frank Cheatham, chief quartermaster of the Department of Hawaii, backed up by tests of soil and climate observations made by the Department of Agriculture, and by the opinion of some local experts, that the government can raise all the forage necessary for Schofield Barracks right on the big military reservation.

"This is a very important matter, and one which the quartermaster's department means to investigate fully," said Major Cheatham this morning. "Not only from the standpoint of economy, but also for strategic reasons, it would be highly desirable to raise our own hay at Schofield. We have plenty of land available, and it is only a question of whether the hay will mature properly without rusting. I think there will be no difficulty in curing it, for although it might be caught in one or two showers, it could be dried without injury."

Experiment Under Way. "One of the Cavalry officers, Dr. Vans Agnew, is now experimenting with alfalfa. He is plowing to seed about 10 acres, which will be irrigated by the waste water from the post. We will eventually have plenty of water at Schofield, and I am watching the experiment with great interest, as it will settle one of the big problems of mounted troops in the Hawaiian Islands."

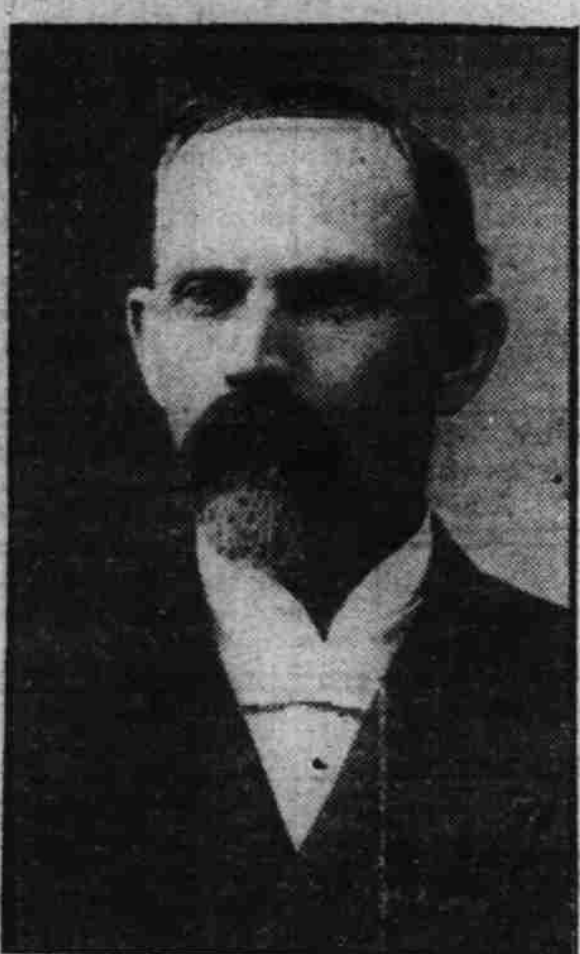

The delay in getting the last shipment of hay was due to uncertainty about the army appropriation bill, the quartermaster's department having to hold off ordering it from Colonel W. W. Robinson, the Seattle feed and produce contractor, who recently landed the large army contract for Oahu.
